Lexor's a Hit With Family Jewels Find

Governor Luth Lexor announced today that he found and was going to return the priceless and very valuable jewels of Armenia's leading family, the Kocharians. News of their disappearance shocked the world a week ago and every investigative agency in the world that had spare time was looking for them - most don't like it when family jewels are grabbed by force and without permission.

Lexor's special security force apparently discovered some "chatter" among the communication of international thieves and they were able to find the jewels in a secret and empty hide-out nearby. Luther said, "I am certain we will find those responsible for this heinous act, but until then I will ensure the family jewels are safe and comfortable in my own hands until returned to their owners."

Octopussy Named New L8 Head

The Lawrence Lincoln Livermore Laboratory for the Laser Linked Lunar Launchpad (L8) named Dr. Octopussy as its new director.

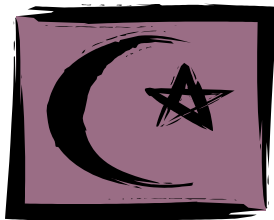

"Dr. O is a fine replacement and I'm confident she will lead our research into the next phase of brilliant gestation with pretty lights and, my personal favorite, with a bang!", said Governor Lexor when repeating what the President told him over the phone.

The L8 was without a director for only two days after Professor Zavior was deported to Germany for allegedly being in the country illegally and also without a visa. While the L8 is responsible for several public DOE & private DOD contracts, it is rumored to be a vital part of the President's Star Wars II program.

Green Brute Primary Suspect in Bridge Collapse

Police have new evidence as to who was the perpetrator of the Lois Lane Bridge collapse of last week. A picture has turned up of a muscular, vain, surprisingly handsome and green man posing for a camera in front of the bridge moments before it collapsed.

Police figured out it was moments before from the handy time stamp in the lower right corner of the picture. Since motorists reported seeing someone in green running across the bridge right before it collapsed, this is the police's primary suspect.

Be on the look out and report his whereabouts immediately. Keep distance as suspect is reported to have access to highly volatile and also dangerous chemicals.

Opinion: Myth of SuperFan - All Hot Air

By Jenny Olsen

Today's photograph of what could be a flying person reminded me of our country's initial love of U.F.O.s in the fifties. We were looking for something out of the ordinary to balance our fear from the cold war in an escapist fashion.

This is very similar - our fear from unknown enemies (terrorists, communists, illegal aliens, etc) makes us yearn for a hero that's more fantastic than real. Rumors of a SuperFan have come and gone whenever someone needs to explain the unexplainable.

So, can he fly? Speak with animals? Can he stun with his looks? Disappear in a flash?

If he's so incredible, why doesn't he show himself to his dotting public? Looking to him to "Save the day" is a waste of energy when we're much more likely to get results from trusting our government and prayer.

Any effort to learn more about SuperFan is wasted like heat in a hot-air balloon (which is most likely above our "flying man" picture).

World's Favorite Intoxicant is Alcohol

Scientists and field researchers announced at the NIR Conference that alcohol is the worlds most favorite intoxicant.

"After many years of gruelling research, [hiccup] trying every known concoction in every corner of the world, [hiccup] alcohol seems to be consistently the intoxicant of choice," hiccupped Dr. Soussed after reporting the results.

"While being intoxicated can be fun," said one critic, "it can be dangerous as you may forget where you parked afterwards. I recommend just walking home at that point."

Public Service Announcement

This is a quick note to all would-be online auctioneers: Folks, if you're going to be selling something that people are going to be drinking fluids out of, please take the extra time to either put on some clothes before taking a picture, or concentrate on selling the non-reflective items in your kitchen. Thank you.
